

In a Blink...

I can't believe my last blog entry was in October 2005! A lot's happened since then…left G4 after five years (mostly with TechTV) and started my own online gadget show (I guess I mentioned that in the news section). After three episodes and a CES Special, I put it on hold having spent a significant portion of my personal savings. The show wasn't perfect, but I'm amazed at the quality we achieved with such a small crew and ridiculously small budget. I learned a lot…especially how important your friends are (you know who you are). InDigital will be back…in fact the next episode and an InDigital Bytes is in edit. After that we're gearing up for a big re-launch with some major changes.

What else have I done? I did some writing for NewsFactor, an online tech publication that recently went into the print world. Some of my stories ended up in a couple of the issues…cool…I'm not published in print. My housemate worked for them for a while, so he threw me some stories when I had time. InDigital took so much time, I didn't write as much as I had hoped.

I interviewed with Yahoo! Tech for one of the Advisor positions. Obviously I didn't get the job, but I got a few writing samples that I'll post in my site. I spent the time, so I should put it to use, right?

For the Electronic Entertainment Expo (E3), I mostly just wandered around while my friends ran around frantically shooting for their respective projects. I did spend a few hours with Fuel TV taping some interstitials for their show The Daily Habit.

So, I've been busy…okay…not that busy…I spent many days looking for my new favorite breakfast place, but we all need some time away every now and again.
