

The Latest...

Tuesday, 16 December 2008

I've been getting lots of email from fans of InDigital wondering what I've been up to lately. I'm currently working for an online television network as their in-house tech guy. There's a state-of-the-art green screen studio system along with a bunch of remote cameras across the country and Web cams too. The shows are streamed out live to the Web in real-time (actually there's a small delay). It's intense stuff putting out around 2 hours live everyday and like all technology, there's always something that doesn't seem to work quite the way you expected. The site? It's called PJTV and they cover politics from the right side of center. While the politics might not necessarily agree with me, I like the technology behind the scenes.

On the personal side, I've been looking into going to law school, probably specializing in intellectual property. Since leaving Revision3, I've been preparing for the LSAT and it's all finally done. I graduated college well a long time ago, so it was an interesting experience getting my brain to focus on a singular task when that really isn't the case in the working world where multi-tasking is the norm. Being part of the Internet generation and working in the space for so long didn't help either. I became accustomed to that browsing the Web instead of reading critically. I would hit a site, get the gist of what they're talking about, and then move on. It turns out that the LSAT isn't really conducive to that type of thinking. It's all about being fast, thorough, and precise; it helps to remember every detail you've read and know the meaning of some, unless, and most. I don't get my score until right after the New Year, but now it's time to start filling out applications; keeping the fingers crossed.